Leukemia inhibitory factor (LIF) is a pleiotropic cytokine essential for embryonic development and trophoblast implantation. Recent studies have demonstrated that it plays a key role in inflammation and immunity. In this study, we show that LIF directly induces dendritic cell (DC) differentiation from bone marrow progenitor cells in vitro. LIF treatment increased DC differentiation, expression of major histocompatibility complex (MHC) class I and II, costimulatory molecules, and inflammatory cytokines. LIF also stimulated DC migration and differentiation into pDCs. Although LIF is an IFN-related cytokine, LIF did not affect DC maturation in response to TLR agonists or tumor cell superantigen. Furthermore, LIF-mediated DC differentiation was completely blocked by IFN-beta, a specific inhibitor for LIF-induced Jak-Stat signaling. In contrast, the p38 mitogen-activated protein kinase (MAPK) inhibitor SB203580 completely blocked LIF-induced DC differentiation, implicating p38 in this process. Furthermore, LIF induced DC differentiation in a time-dependent manner, and the time window was extended by coculture with an osteoblastic cell line. LIF-induced DC differentiation was also partially mediated via activating the LIF receptor, and blockage of LIF receptor markedly attenuated LIF-induced DC differentiation. Together,
